COPYRIGHT MATERIAL

If you expect your video project to really be "yours," after it is completed, it's best to make sure that all of the material you use has been created by you or people who are working for you on the project. If you or one of your co-workers uses material owned by others, you may find yourself spending time with lawyers instead of looking for more video projects to produce.

The use of other people's material is copyright infringement, and if you are caught doing it, you have created a legal problem for yourself. The problem arises very often when copyrighted music is used without permission; however, it also includes any material that has been copyrighted by someone else, including plays, books, poetry, photographs, etc. There are four simple approaches to avoiding this problem.

First, if you need to use copyrighted material in your program, contact the copyright holder (author, publishing company, record company, artist, photographer) in writing and ask for permission to use the material. In your request, be as specific as you can as to your intentions. Name the material, the excerpt (if appropriate), the program it will be used in, the distribution or exhibition plans and any other relevant information. If you do this far enough in advance of your production time, you may get an approval for use of the materials or clearance as it is referred to in the publishing business.

A second approach is to use material that is in the public domain — material that has never been copyrighted or materials whose copyright has expired. Material that has not been copyrighted is probably available from the public library or from a local writer, amateur musician or photographer. They may have excellent material already prepared or may be able to put together something that is tailor-made for your project. Material written or composed long ago, such as the Bible, Shakespearean plays, classical music, old folk tunes, etc., is generally available for use, since there never was a copyright or it has long since expired.

A third approach to dealing with copyrighted material is to pay a fee to the copyright holder or to subscribe to a service, such as a music library service. Copyright holders can charge whatever they feel is appropriate for the use of their material. However, since access productions are traditionally non-commercial and the producers do not use the material to make or solicit money, permission for use is frequently given at no charge other than credit or acknowledgement on the program. Cablevision has agreements with the major music copyright holders (ASCAP, BMI, SESAC) for the performance of their music pieces. This does not include synchronization rights, which must be procured by the producer.

The fourth approach is to hire a writer or musician who will use original compositions and perform them for you. Once you pay for this service, you should own the privilege of using the material.

INTERIOR LOCATION

1. Make approximate scale sketch of floor plan for each location.
2. Indicate all furniture and major props on plan.
3. Indicate location of doors and windows on plan
4. Indicate directions on plan (north, east, etc.).
5. Indicate location of all AC outlets and circuits on plan.

7. Record name and telephone number of building electrician.
9. Note wall colors for background
10. Is there noise from air vents? If so, can it be turned off?
11. Warn occupant of "mess" that shoot will make; promise that "mess" is only temporary and that room(s) will be restored (keep your promise).
12. Check for possible noise from outside (lawn mowers, trucks, airport traffic, etc.).
13. Check for inside noise — faulty fluorescent lights, phones, typewriters, etc.).
14. Find positions for human subjects — at least 4 to 6 feet away from walls, whenever possible, for best lighting and pictures.
15. Be sure building custodian or owner has given written permission to shoot.
16. Give occupants an accurate estimate of production time (try to finish early whenever possible).
17. Be sure to arrange for rooms or buildings to be unlocked if early arrival is anticipated.
18. If tripod will not be available for camera, or if there is no room for a tripod, find alternate support at the location site.
19. Check where power lines can be run to keep from being a hazard or interfering with traffic — indicate on floor plan.

EXTERIOR LOCATION

1. Sketch a ground plan to approximate scale (usually $\frac{1}{2}'' = 1$ foot) of the production area. Indicate location of buildings, shrubs, trees, streets, walks, etc. Be sure to indicate north, east, south, and west directions on the plan, so you will know where the sun will be at all times.

2. Check to find exterior AC outlets and circuits, or nearby interior ones. Get permission to use them. Measure distances from shooting area, so you'll know how much AC line to bring.

3. Find background for subject that justifies exterior location production. Locate landmarks, buildings, etc., far enough away so they can be seen and identified in the background.

4. Consider the direction your camera will shoot when you make up your schedule. Don't find yourself shooting into the sun.

5. Find alternate sheltered location to use in case of rain.

6. Plan for supplementary lighting in case sheltered area is used.

7. Be sure permits and/or permissions have been granted by all concerned (police department, building and property owners, etc.).

8. Find location for camera and other equipment out of hot sun if possible, or bring beach umbrella to shade equipment to keep it from overheating. Umbrellas will be useful in case of a sudden shower. Painter's plastic drop cloths are good for such emergencies, too.
